Dear David,

First of all, I am numbering your letter of 16 March 73 by paragraphs. I would like to elucidate the structure of concern, of questions and discussion, in your letter, to know where to begin in the most coherent way to reply. However, I have learned much from my brother, in the course of our letters, about Being and Discourse. So I will sit back and think how happy I am that you wrote, and that I am real, and that you are real.

Several interesting things are, or will be going in your direction generally <sup>or eventually</sup> from here, in the near future. Do you think you would like them?

These include:

a copy of a letter to my brother of some eighteen pages +

(hopefully) a copy of a letter to Benit Lakey, probably of Philadelphia a brochure with a few markings

a work of art suitable for wall decoration

copy of letter and architectural project plans recieved from Pat Givim, philosopher of Boston

a map of Nevada

Would you like to engage in a correspondence seminar with Richard and myself about education and philosophy?

I recieved today a letter from Dick in which he said that our letter exchange project should be kept separate from his research project else things would become too complicated.

I have responded that I might start a research project on Independent Study, and so might David.

I'm sending the incomplete copy of my letter to my brother which I have, and am retaining one full copy so that I may make more when I get some money. I'll send copies of the missing pages then, and, like having the lights on when trying to view a picture, they should make later reading more enjoyable.

If I can find someone to exchange a roosevelt for ten lincolns I'll call you tonight on the phone, for pennies are my only monies now.
