How glad I am that you forgave me all! Anyway I feel like I have a whole bunch to make up to you. +

Part of our medical lab will be 'goat lab' where we perform 19 or some such number of operations on the animal, which will subsequently die (?)

If mine dies, and I have been assured that he will, then I have thought to make the best of the potential learning situation and really take him apart. And I would like to have a microscope but since we don't need to know that sort of stuff I'll probably have to bring my own or borrow someone's to bring. Anyway I should prepare for the few hours I will have for that anatomical-physiological (gross and cellular) grand tour. Do you have resources and/or suggestions? I already have an interest in carving out and examining the putamen and substantia nigra (if goats have 'em) and the extrapyramidal system of the brain, plus some of the things we have been taught about before: kidneys nephro, lymphatic, and nervous systems.

Do you have a tape recorder? When are your
